Yes, I too have noted the spread of a new 'community theology' type of reasoning/teaching. I also must agree that to state that 'humans were created for community' is a theological reductionism. It could be a good way to start a sermon, possibly, as long as things are then broadened out and fully explained.

This is no public discussion, for biblical theology is the sole practice of the church, the confessing community. This is not to say that such a use of biblical theology is uncritical, but only to claim that the concern is not with secular models of truth, but with in-house models defined entirely by the confessing church.
